VOTERÍA debunks ‘my vote doesn’t matter’

New efforts are made to encourage El Pasoans to vote in local elections

BY MICHAELA ROMÁN

The Prospector

La Loteria, also known as Mexican Bingo, has been a favorite pastime in Mexican culture for generations. Whether played on holidays with family for prizes or teaching U.S. children Spanish—the century-old game is one many have become familiar with.

Concejal de Aztlán, a lecturer in liberal arts at UTEP, along with being a member of El Paso Equal Voice Network wanted to inform El Pasos and young voters about the importance of voting, and used the popular game to inform potential voters with their version—Juego De Votaríta.

The EPEVN network is made up of local organizations such as La Mujer Obreña, AYUDA, Border Network for Human Rights, Texas Rio Grande Legal Aid and the Paso del Norte Civil Rights Project. These organizations work together to address issues affecting low-income families in the community.

Because it’s an election year, the coalition wanted voter engagement to be their main focus.

“We found that voter registration never went far enough because it didn’t guarantee that people would be informed on who’s voting for, what they’re voting for or how they’re voting,” said de Aztlán.

The network worked to address the fact that, when it comes to the issues, the root of change is policy.

“Voters in El Paso were mostly coming out for the presidential election despite the fact that local elections matter more,” de Aztlán said.

Each square of the Voteara cards tells a story about an issue at hand in the El Paso community such as fracking, children being denied their birth certificates and immigration policy.

“We got really great funding and printed about 200 card games. It comes with curriculum in both English and Spanish and goes into specific issues, making it a great teaching kit,” de Aztlán said.

De Aztlán and those working with the network have been going to different community events and setting up the games to teach the issues at hand in a fun way.

“We just set up the table and play and it gives people that much of an edge,” de Aztlán said. “It’s like that moment of realizing or enlightenment that we got them to see some realizing that their vote matters.”

Local artists Zoé Pina and Rogelio Lemus collaborated on the artwork for the game. They worked together for months on the illustrations and making behind each image.

The game has now been inducted into the Austin Medal Latina American Collection at UT Austin.

Voto Latino—a media organization that recognizes Latino leadership based in Washington D.C.—also contacted the equal voice network about using the card game.

“Despite the fact that it’s very El Paso specific, people can relate to the issues anywhere, specifically communities of low-income and color,” de Aztlán said.

De Aztlán continues to give around two Voteara presentations each week. The wants people throughout El Paso to feel connected to the issues through the game.

“You also see that you and your culture are important in the political process despite the historical neglect that we’ve been invisible and left out,” de Aztlán said.

De Aztlán also wants El Pasoans to know that their basic needs can be met just from voting.

“In the end no matter who wins, every vote that’s subtracted means that federal and state dollars that pave your streets and fund your schools, and so on really means on people to consider why their vote matters,” de Aztlán said.

The United States Census Bureau predicts that in the 2020 elections, minorities will become the majority population. The EPEVN network has started on a 20/20 vision project to address this.

“The community is invited to Votearita training sessions, where participants can become voter registration deputies and inform others about the issues and register them to vote.”

“The minority we give thumbs up, the majority we come,” de Aztlán said.

Irony at its finest

BY RENE DELGADILLO

We as Mexicans feel pride and Hispanics complain about Trump’s idea of building a wall. We defend our flag and our people, and we expose all the injustices that our people suffer as a minority in the U.S. We speak with pride about our people and culture, without noticing that Mexico is racist against immigrants, just as much as the United States.

Did you know about the Mexican newspaper that supports Trump’s idea of building a wall? El Maluma, a newspaper in the state of Tamaulipas, reported that the idea of the Republican candidate is a good one, the only difference is that they want a wall between southern Mexico and Central America.

El Maluma said that the immigration problem that Mexico and the U.S. are going through can be resolved with the construction of a wall that would prevent illegal Central Americans from entering Mexico.

“Peace and tranquility has ended in the Mexican border and deported Central Americans from the U.S. who stay in Mexican territory have been a cause of this loss of peace,” El Maluma wrote.

El Maluma also said that Central Americans are deported from the U.S. to Mexico territory and not to their original country, which presents a problem for Mexican people. They said that many Central Americans become delinquents, who commit crimes such as kidnappings, and in the worst of the cases, they end up losing the drug cartels.

Irony at its finest! I think so.

How can a Mexican newspaper support the idea of a wall in the southern border knowing the sufferings that the Mexican population has to experience once they decide to reach out for the “American dream”?

Why are they making Central Americans responsible for crimes? Instead of making these arguments against immigrants, make your government responsible for the crimes in your nation.

Central Americans just want a better life, so why should we blame them for the violence in Mexico? The comments by El Maluma are different to Trump when he insulted Mexican immigrants.

How can you ask for a wall between Mexico and Guatemala without taking into consideration all the abuses that your country commits against immigrants?

The Guardian has reported that Mexican officials in the southern border confuse their own citizens by calling them illegal Central Americans. Many of these indigenous Mexicans don’t speak Spanish, and as a result, many officials take advantage of the indigenous people.

They are accused of holding false documents and forced to sign documents without knowing what are they agreeing to.

According to The Guardian, Mexican officials physically abuse Central Americans and Mexicans, who they think are not legal. They are deported to Guatemala, a country they don’t know anything about.

Yes, authorities in the southern border of Mexico have and continue to abuse Central Americans immigrants. Complaints of abuse caused by Mexican officials have grown by 40 percent after President Enrique Pena Nieto border plan was implemented in 2014.

Also at the end of June 2015, Mexico’s National Commission on Human Rights reported that 567 abuse complaints had been filed against officials at the National Migration Institute. The idea was to have a safer border and to have human rights protected, even for people without Mexican nationality. Safer border and protection of rights? Does it sound familiar to Trump’s idea?

It pretty much does. Trump has made it clear that he wants to build a wall that would stop the “rapists and the ones who bring crime,” but allow the entrance of those immigrants who do good while respecting “American values.”

Many of us are not informed, we make judgments and we feel as we are the biggest victims of these immigration issues.

The reality is that Central Americans have it way harder than Mexicans, and just to make it clear, I’m not trying to minimize the injustice that Mexican people suffer. But it’s time for Mexicans to understand that other people have to travel greater distances and have to go through bigger injustices.

A study by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean reported that it is the poverty rate of immigrants who come illegally to Mexico that has forced many to leave their native countries.

Mexico and Central America have a poverty problem, and it’s pretty big, which forces many to leave. But when it comes to resources and opportunities, Central Americans are much further behind than the people of Mexico.

- Central Americans suffer in Mexico territory, they suffer physical violence, they travel on “The Beast,” a dangerous train, women are raped, and others suffer hunger and racism even before reaching the United States.

The abuses and sacrifices of Mexican people have to go through are important issues that must be resolved. We should all speak against these injustices, but with out forgetting about Central Americans.

Even though I don’t support the Republican nominee, I believe that before criticizing Trump you should look at your own country and see if similarities exist.

Voter turnout on the border still low

BY CHRISTIAN VASQUEZ

The Prospector

Voter turnout in El Paso is so low that it is considered among the lowest in the country. Since 50 percent of registered voters decided to participate in the government process, the presidential elections usually do not number the millions of voters compared to the regional elections, which is what happened in 1992, when voting was at 64.3 percent of registered voters, according to the Texas Secretary of State department. And while it does make sense that the more media-driven elections encourage more people to vote, it leaves the fate of El Paso in the hands of a few thousand.

Illiana Holguín, chair of the El Paso Democratic Party, said that it’s a problem of information and El Paso’s own organizations.

“Then’s a lot of groups who try to register new voters and who successfully register new voters,” said Holguín. “The reason we don’t see that translate into more people voting is that I don’t think a lot of these organizations, and I’m going to include ourselves in it, I don’t think we do a good enough job in following through with these voters.”

Currently, El Paso County has 420,192 registered voters, which might sound like a lot, but falls short for two reasons.

The population is 835,932, according to the 2015 census report. Of total population, 27.9 percent are under the age of 18, which makes the number of eligible voters, assuming they are all eligible, at 602,462.

Compared to the number of registered voters, El Paso appears to have a solid group on getting citizens to register. The number of registered voters has steadily increased since 88, when it was just 194,671.

The reason the number of registered voters falls short is because the number of actual voters has fallen dramatically since 88. In fact, the number of actual voters is lower than it was in 88, which was 118,791. In 2014, only 420,279 voters were cast out of 803,979 registered voters.

Rick Hannah, executive director of the Republican Party of El Paso, explained the problem.

“You know we had a mayor elected with something like 3 percent of the population,” said Perry. “They say 3 percent of the electorate (vote)? But how many people are even electorate?”

According to the El Paso County Elections, the mayoral election had only 44,762 voters participate, and out of those votes, Oscar Leeser won by 21,776 votes.

“We have a very extremely low voter turnout, and we have a lot of people registered, they just don’t vote,” said Perry.

Registration is only the first step to voting. In the most important step, actually casting the vote, El Paso falls far behind.

El Paso is a council-manager form of government, meaning that El Paso elects a mayor alongside eight council members, each of which represents a district in El Paso. And while the mayor is elected by a fraction of the population, the council members are a fraction of that fraction. The votes for city council members range as low as 2,681 for District 5 to as high as 6,508 for District 7.

“You have one city council to elect that by just a few hundred voters and those people manage a budget of half a billion dollars,” said Perry.

“A corporation of that size would not have that type of representation—people would watch it.”

Those few hundred voters decide here the city’s money is going to be spent. From the construction that surrounds Mesa Street to the policies of the El Paso Police Department, it is all in the hands of those who take the time to vote.

“These are the entities that tax us as homeowners, they determine our tax rate, they determine the policies that govern our actual day-to-day life,” said Holguín. “Not just city council and the mayor, but the school-board elections. School boards are also major entities and so they decide whether or not they want to bring bond proposals to the voters.”

But the city has a plan to help boost those votes. In 2018, the elections will be moved from May to November in hopes of getting more people to vote at once. Since El Paso has the greatest number of people voting when there is a presidential election alongside other municipal elections, the plan is to have other municipal elections bundled together so people can vote for multiple positions.

“Right now our city council races are held in May; they’re staggered terms so you see the same problem everywhere,” Holguín said. “When the mayor is up for election, you get a higher voter turnout, but when it’s the off-year only when four-city reps are up for election, you get a lower turnout.”

However, Perry fears that this will decrease the number of people voting with a solid group of the candidate’s policies.

“How much can a candidate for municipal court judge position or a candidate for city council or commissioners court—how can he reach the people when he’s going against the billions of dollars of advertising on television,” said Perry. “Because Governor Abbott has a lot more money than the city council woman X.”

These elections might also encourage straight-ticket voting, where a person votes down the ballot for the party that they identify closest toward, which might bode well for Democrat since El Paso has traditionally voted blue.

But if people cannot find the time to research every candidate from the president down to the sheriff come November, some wonder if the increase in votes is worth it.

ULTRO student selected as an Archer Fellow in D.C.

BY GRECIA SANCHEZ

Kristian Villegas, a junior political science major, recently was selected for the Bill Archer Fellowship Program. The award offers juniors, seniors and graduate students the opportunity to receive first-hand networking and learning experiences in Washington D.C.

The fellowship was started by Congressman Bill Archer, along with the University of Texas System in 2001. The program involves students taking credit classes, assisting with major-related events and interning at places such as the White House, Capital Hill, the Smithsonian or NASA.

"My responsibilities at the fellowship are the same as if I was still physically at UTEP—I attend class, I go to my internship on a daily basis and I stay out of trouble," Villegas said. "A big responsibility that I have is to represent my university—UTEP—in Washington as professionally as I can!"

Villegas said it was at a senate meeting in the Student Government Association that he first heard about the fellowship. "A former student, known as an Archer Fellow, was presenting the program to the audience learning about the program," said Villegas. "When I found out that I had to at least be a junior to apply, I felt discouraged, but was determined to apply to the program the second I got into my junior year and so I did!"

Fellowship winners started their internships on Aug. 22 and will continue for the entire fall semester until Dec. 11. In order to become the only UTEP student who was granted the fellowship in this year’s cycle, Villegas had to have previous internship and community service experience; maintain an average of 3.0 GPA; complete basic government classes as well as 24 credit hours at UTEP.

"The process of applying for the program is a lot of work, but manageable. You need to give your resume, two letters of recommendation, transcript, an essay on a policy and a personal statement," Villegas said.

Once Villegas completed all of these requirements he proceeded to a single interview. He had already begun training with UTEP Archer coordinator, Christian Corrales, who helps students who are selected to the program.

"Much of what is discussed in the interview is the student’s knowledge on policy and politics," Villegas said. "So for those who apply, they should be caught up on current events and some policy news," said Villegas.

Besides getting ahead of the competition, Villegas had to find funds for the program. "The program, along with UTEP, helped a lot with funding, but a student in my position would have to save a lot of money in order to live in Washington D.C. and pay for the housing and program fees," Villegas said. "Once you get here, you also have to begin to budget your money efficiently, so that you don't end up half way through the semester with no money in your pocket!"

Villegas found out about this accomplishment while he was at the barbershop with his mother and his brother.

"I was checking my email on my phone and there it was. When I read it I was accepted, I didn't know how I felt. It was a mixture of relief, excitement, and overall happiness," Villegas said. "It's difficult to describe, but at that moment I felt like I was in the middle of a dream and was hoping that it never ended!"

Villegas later realized his dream was about to begin. He admits being in a state of "culture shock" because of the people he has met and the places he gets to visit at his internship.

"Right now, I'm still not believing the things that I see and experience as reality. Overall, I am very fortunate to have the opportunity I have to be here and I encourage everyone at UTEP to apply to this amazing program," Villegas said.

"The process to get here may be difficult, but in the end I guarantee that you will not regret the experience!"

Villegas's future plans are to attend law school somewhere in the Northeast, and one of his major career goals is to become a district attorney.

"Along the way, I want to someday hold public office, and by being an Archer Fellow, I have been able to learn so much about our political system and how best to operate within it," Villegas said. "It is amazing just how much one would learn from talking to a senator or a judge about all the good things you can do and the strategies used to achieve those ends!"

Applications for Bill Archer Fellowship 2017 will open on Nov. 2 of this year. For more information about the program, contact Christian Corrales at Union East, room 302 E or at ccorrales@utep.edu.

Coping with sexual assault through comedy

BY MICHAELA ROMAN
The Prospector

According to the Rape, Abuse, Incest National Network, every 159 seconds an American is sexually assaulted. In 2014, a study done by the Bureau of Justice said 91 percent of rapes on campus go unreported.

Ron Blake made a stop at UTEP on Sept. 23 to share his story.

One night in 2011, when Blake was living in downtown Phoenix, three men came into his loft while he was asleep, one of which was his life partner. They held him down and sexually assaulted him. The trauma from that night is what caused Blake's post traumatic stress disorder.

"I was reading an article in Time magazine—sexual assault on campus—and when I read that article, it really triggered something in me, and I talked to my friend and said, you know I think I was raped," said Blake.

The police showed up that night, but Blake was unable to comprehend reality.

"I have something bad happened that night," Blake said. "I just never processed it as rape."

Blake sought help from a psychiatrist and therapist and that's when they diagnosed him with PTSD.

"The two symptoms I exhibited were anger and isolation because I started pulling away from people bodily and I had a lot of rage," said Blake.

Years later, Blake attempted suicide after a week of nightmares and not being able to sleep. A week after his attempt, he went to social media to confront the assault head on by opening up to his friends and family about his experience.

After positive feedback from his friends, things started to look up for Blake, but it was still an emotional tumult for him.

"You're going to have your moments, you're going to have your triggers, you are going to have your tough times,' he said.

One night in the midst of a post traumatic episode, Blake was watching the "Late Night with Steven Colbert" show and found himself laughing.

The show became what Blake calls his "safe zone—his comfort zone. That's when he got the idea for "The Blake Show," as he refers to his story and his ability to make light of the situation.

"I'm controlling the story instead of it controlling me."

I identified I was laughing. Some people would just sit there and let that go by and it wouldn't be a big deal. For me, I was just środ," Blake said.

Blake has traveled to Arizona State University, University of Arizona, Northern Arizona University, Pima to 10 community colleges and a couple of UTEP.

He estimates he has been to around 15 colleges and four universities. Blake careerizes around large white boards and asks people if they'd like to write a message after he shares his story. He collected over 200 boards with thousands of messages in multiple languages, and by sharing his stories Blake found that those who have been assaulted are comfortable about opening up.

"Anybody that's been raped, they just need to understand—they need to know it's okay to talk about it," Blake said. "Once they start talking about it, there's probably going to be a tendency to say, 'If I am raped, I'm going to go like a police report.'"

Although Blake's goal is still to eventually reach out to Steven Colbert's show, he's happy if the boards can be turned into an art project and showcased somewhere and make an impact in the lives around him.

"They are our, it's powerful, it helps people. They read them and it's amazing because people will share stuff on here," he said.

Blake would like to continue reaching out to those who have been sexually assaulted, travel to more universities and maybe work with organizations if that's a possibility.

"I'm controlling the story instead of it controlling me."

To support Ron Blake on his journey, you can search for his Facebook page, Blake Late Show.

Advice for pedestrians

Wear earphones, but stay in a lane

We get it, Drake can drown out your sorrows in the world, I’m sure, but it’ll also drown out a screaming skater warning you to get out of the way. Keep jamming, and while it’s best to not wear headphones at all, make sure keep from zigzagging all over the sidewalk to save yourself some wood to the backs of your heels.

Walk the gravel by Centennial Plaza

Who knows why the University thought putting dirt on one half of the walkway would be a good idea, but between wheels and feet, feet fare better in the dirt. It’s a gesture of good will, just as them not crushing into your heel is a gesture of good health.

Don’t panic

Skaters will usually weave around pedestrians, so don’t freak out and cause a collision. Trying to jule them out will scare them, forcing them to react by trying to get a quick turn, probably in the wrong way. At best, just stand like a pole and make eye contact with them, a look that says “I’m not moving so you can. Watch my shiny please!” More often than not, they’ll cruise by no problem. If you do freak out and a collision does happen, at worst you’ll end up with a bruise, at best you’ve just began a rom-com-styled first encounter with your future spouse! What? It can happen.

Move on after a crash

It’s totally understandable you are completely zoning out thinking about lunch or drumming up an excuse to skip class, maybe thinking about cats for some reason, when out of nowhere a guy flies shoulder-first into the street and flops like a doll. Ask if they’re okay and make sure there isn’t any blood, but other than that carry on about your day as usual. They’ve crashed before and are completely aware that everyone, including Dr. Natalicio (probably), saw them eat it, so let them collect their dignity in peace. That and tell your friends about the weird little squeal they did when they hit the ground.

See something cool? Let them know

Standing on a board is hard. Standing on a moving board is harder, but standing on a moving board in public and looking like you belong on it? It takes a few long nights in the drive-way practicing in order to pull off the look, and one brave soul lands a trick while on his way to the Liberal Arts building, just give him a clap, a quick “woo-hoo” even. That kid sacrificed his pride and his jeans on a Wednesday, all just to give you something cool to look at, so thank him for it.

Advice for boarders

Avoid the packed hours

The campus gets crowded after early classes let out at around 9:30 a.m. and at 11 a.m. when students head to lunch. You won’t be able to ride on the smooth sidewalk for more than a few feet before getting stuck behind a cluster of students, so it’s best to walk or take to the street and grind through the cracked pavement.

Call out which side you’re passing on

A quick “On your right!” call will leave you a lane to pass through and will prevent a collision when a student suddenly decides to cross the street. It may look unmoved, but what’s also unmoved is knocking down a pretty girl in a dress.

Don’t treat a pack of students like a bonus round

These aren’t fallen branches or rocks to test your turn radius with—they are people too. As much as it sucks to lose your speed and jump off your board, moving around the pack is your best bet. With all the time you saved riding up to this point, picking the board up for a few seconds will not make you late to class. That, or for the more daring riders, screaming nonsense like “pizazz!” while waving your arms wildly will clear the crowd.

Know the routes

Visitors to UTEP love how snug the campus fits within the mountains. These people have yet to run from the Union to Old Main to get to class on time. Campus is all hills, and a well-planned route could save you minutes—and social—from walking uphill with your board. Misjudging a hill on campus, however, could push you past the limit of a foot-brake and into a car.

Recover from a crash

Skating makes you look cool, no doubt about that. Gliding down the sidewalk with your backpack says something like “I devour knowledge, but I also own fake Ray-Bans.” But what’s not cool is a wipe-out. You’ll clip a curb, maybe turn too hard and land on your face or your board might slip out from underneath you like a banana peel. It happens, so the best thing to do is to get up and shake it off. Someone definitely saw you, so take a bow and chase down your board, it’s probably the most exciting thing anyone has seen all day.

The skater and pedestrian: tips for coexistence

The era of campus construction is finally over, and more students have been able to use alternative methods for commuting between classes. While bikes have always been a popular choice and hover boards are finally going out of style, this semester more students have been riding longboards, skateboards and penny boards to get around. Here are a few tips for skaters of all types to keep injuries and fights resulting from an angered (and injured) pedestrian.

By Eric Vasquez

The skater and pedestrian: tips for coexistence

The campus gets crowded after early classes let out at around 9:30 a.m. and at 11 a.m. when students head to lunch. You won’t be able to ride on the smooth sidewalk for more than a few feet before getting stuck behind a cluster of students, so it’s best to walk or take to the street and grind through the cracked pavement.

Advice for pedestrians

Wear earphones, but stay in a lane

We get it, Drake can drown out your sorrows in the world, I’m sure, but it’ll also drown out a screaming skater warning you to get out of the way. Keep jamming, and while it’s best to not wear headphones at all, make sure keep from zigzagging all over the sidewalk to save yourself some wood to the backs of your heels.

Walk the gravel by Centennial Plaza

Who knows why the University thought putting dirt on one half of the walkway would be a good idea, but between wheels and feet, feet fare better in the dirt. It’s a gesture of good will, just as them not crushing into your heel is a gesture of good health.

Don’t panic

Skaters will usually weave around pedestrians, so don’t freak out and cause a collision. Trying to jule them out will scare them, forcing them to react by trying to get a quick turn, probably in the wrong way. At best, just stand like a pole and make eye contact with them, a look that says “I’m not moving so you can. Watch my shiny please!” More often than not, they’ll cruise by no problem. If you do freak out and a collision does happen, at worst you’ll end up with a bruise, at best you’ve just began a rom-com-styled first encounter with your future spouse! What? It can happen.

Move on after a crash

It’s totally understandable you are completely zoning out thinking about lunch or drumming up an excuse to skip class, maybe thinking about cats for some reason, when out of nowhere a guy flies shoulder-first into the street and flops like a doll. Ask if they’re okay and make sure there isn’t any blood, but other than that carry on about your day as usual. They’ve crashed before and are completely aware that everyone, including Dr. Natalicio (probably), saw them eat it, so let them collect their dignity in peace. That and tell your friends about the weird little squeal they did when they hit the ground.

See something cool? Let them know

Standing on a board is hard. Standing on a moving board is harder, but standing on a moving board in public and looking like you belong on it? It takes a few long nights in the drive-way practicing in order to pull off the look, and one brave soul lands a trick while on his way to the Liberal Arts building, just give him a clap, a quick “woo-hoo” even. That kid sacrificed his pride and his jeans on a Wednesday, all just to give you something cool to look at, so thank him for it.

Advice for boarders

Avoid the packed hours

The campus gets crowded after early classes let out at around 9:30 a.m. and at 11 a.m. when students head to lunch. You won’t be able to ride on the smooth sidewalk for more than a few feet before getting stuck behind a cluster of students, so it’s best to walk or take to the street and grind through the cracked pavement.

Call out which side you’re passing on

A quick “On your right!” call will leave you a lane to pass through and will prevent a collision when a student suddenly decides to cross the street. It may look unmoved, but what’s also unmoved is knocking down a pretty girl in a dress.

Don’t treat a pack of students like a bonus round

These aren’t fallen branches or rocks to test your turn radius with—they are people too. As much as it sucks to lose your speed and jump off your board, moving around the pack is your best bet. With all the time you saved riding up to this point, picking the board up for a few seconds will not make you late to class. That, or for the more daring riders, screaming nonsense like “pizazz!” while waving your arms wildly will clear the crowd.

Know the routes

Visitors to UTEP love how snug the campus fits within the mountains. These people have yet to run from the Union to Old Main to get to class on time. Campus is all hills, and a well-planned route could save you minutes—and social—from walking uphill with your board. Misjudging a hill on campus, however, could push you past the limit of a foot-brake and into a car.

Recover from a crash

Skating makes you look cool, no doubt about that. Gliding down the sidewalk with your backpack says something like “I devour knowledge, but I also own fake Ray-Bans.” But what’s not cool is a wipe-out. You’ll clip a curb, maybe turn too hard and land on your face or your board might slip out from underneath you like a banana peel. It happens, so the best thing to do is to get up and shake it off. Someone definitely saw you, so take a bow and chase down your board, it’s probably the most exciting thing anyone has seen all day.
‘Mango Street’ flexes audience’s imagination

BY SHERIDAN LARSON

UTEP’s Theater and Dance Department debuted “The House on Mango Street” on Sept. 22, bringing a mix of UTEP faculty, students, and directors to experience the beloved novel in a new format.

The play takes place in Chicago during the 1940s, a young Latina girl named Esperanza finds out what life as an adolescent can be, the good and the bad, experiencing new friends and a strong sense of family while dealing with sexual abuse and poverty in her Latin neighborhood.

Nancy Batten, a senior theater major who played the main character Esperanza, has performed in the Wise Family Theater seven times and was completely thrilled when she found out that she had gotten the role of Esperanza.

“I was watching TV show and I received the email,” said Batten.

But then I got that feeling of, ‘I definitely want to do it justice.’

The stage was set to give the audience a similar description of what life for Esperanza was like. Telephone wires crisscrossed each other from the ceiling to the floor, slabs of broken pavement sat on each corner, and two broken houses leant as if they were bombed while windows dangled above them.

The minimal stage transformed the stage decorations into other objects. A chair turned into the steering wheel of a yellow Cadillac or the seat of a bicycle with a simple phrase.

The lighting was the glue of the play, helping transition the scenes within and gave the audience a sense of being in the 1940s.

One scene in particular stood out: a man is chased by the police and as steam goes off, the lights create the scene look realistic and thrilling.

The lights also set the mood for each scene to portray the feeling of each character. When Esperanza was comparing herself to the tiny trees on the sidewalk, the light was dim, a grayish blue that gave the feeling of sadness mixed with a sense of peace because Esperanza knows who she is.

When domestic abuse takes place in Esperanza’s neighborhood, the stage was thrown into a deep red light, the color of a young girl’s bloodied face.

In many ways I got caught up in the 1940s, with slurred black bars, bandanas, platform boots and big hoop earrings. Each character played multiple roles to bring the performance together, but I wondered during the play if that was due to a lack of people wanting to audition or if it meant that Esperanza’s community was a tight-knit group.

Unlike classic theater, “The House on Mango Street” utilizes an active narration, an older Esperanza speaking about the past and what she remembers about it. Throughout the play, younger Esperanza talks to the narrators, showing the close connection between older Esperanza and her past.

People seem to have forgotten how important theater can be. When watching plays, one has to use their imagination, but in today’s society, we have lost our use of imagination.

Watching “The House on Mango Street” allowed not only myself but everyone in attendance to use their imagination. Day to day we lose the imaginary part of life, where dreams can actually become reality, but only if we still use our imagination along the way in the journey just like Esperanza imagines leaving Mango Street.

Plays being imagination back to life because growing up in the world today, we have technology to think for us instead of using our “creativity juicer” to produce great ideas.

“The House on Mango Street” covers serious issues that may put life into perspective for the public, but for many young Latina girls in the El Paso community that they are not the only ones dealing with these issues.

Performances for the rest of the month are on Sept. 29 through Oct. 1 at 7:30 p.m. and Oct. 2 at 2:00 p.m. Tickets range from $9.91 and may be purchased an hour before the show at the Wise Family Theatre.

Surreal stage and costumes amplify ‘House on Mango’

The Department of Theater and Dance premiered their adaptation of Sandra Cisneros’ novel, “The House on Mango Street,” with a surreal stage design and exaggerated costumes. The choices in stage design serve to communicate Esperanza’s feeling of entrapment of her economic situation in Mango Street. 1. Esperanza, played by Nancy Batists, points to her little house on Mango Street. 2. Esperanza meets her first friend on Mango Street, played by Cynthia Acosta, as she points out the colorful characters who live in the neighborhood. 3. The Castos children share their feelings about their new home while the narrator/older Esperanza, played by Talia Davis, looks on. 4. On stage as a variety of characters, theater performance majors Gabriel Franco Hull and Cristian Barro are seen from as Esperanza’s childhood younger brothers.

‘Blair Witch’ a cheap imitation

BY ANDRES GALLEGOS

The American movie industry is in an era of recycled ideas. Hollywood is banking on American audiences’ willingness to pay to watch their favorite heroes of a bygone era or to know what ever became of them. Movies such as “Star Wars VII: The Force Awakens,” “Jurassic World,” “Zootopia 2” and “Mad Max: Fury Road” are few examples. One of the most successful indie horror films of the last century, “The Blair Witch Project,” was given an update, even with a new title: “Blair Witch.”

The sequel connects to the 1999 film by a sparse thread, a soft excuse for a new movie in 2016. In this film, we return to the woods near Burkittsville to find that Heather, the protagonist of the original film, has not been seen since the events of the first movie. James, Heather’s brother, sets out to return to the woods in hope of finding a clue to his sister’s disappearance, only to encounter the same horrors of the woods.

With the initial success of the first movie, “Blair Witch” had the potential to expand on it and to become something completely separate. It does not succeed.

Unlike the original, the film relies too much on the look of the supernatural and jump scares. As a review on Rotten Tomatoes says about the 1999 film, “The Blair Witch Project” keeps audiences in the dark about its titular villain, thus proving that imagination can be as scary as anything on screen.”

Grant, 1999 was not known for its computer graphics, and these days we can belittlingly animates a humanoid to kill teenagers, but the original movie proved that even without top-of-the-line equipment, the unknown and unseen is the real horror. The nights in the original are far more disturbing with the sound of children laughing and branches snapping. The shaking camera when they are running disoriented audiences and pushed the limit between movie and observed footage. All of these devices were revolution- ary in 1999. “The Blair Witch Project” is credited with popularizing the discovered-footage genre and proved that jump scares, when executed well, can get the audience’s hearts beating.

“Blair Witch,” with its costume-cutter format of the original, proves that Hollywood can kill authentic, honest revolutions in film by cloning it until the most recent pastes in comparison. The problem with “Blair Witch” is that it tries too hard. It installs horror as it has already been implemented for years. These are glimpses of monsters, there is rain and the van- dooose dolls actually work. The film obviously used its budget, but the real problem here is that it should’ve never been done.

If “Blair Witch” cannot be a game changer for the horror genre, if it cannot even be a scary movie for middle school kids, then the movie needs to serve as a reminder that there are some movies that do not need remakes.

If that cannot be its reason for existing, then Hollywood is fai- ling, not only in producing genuine ideas, but failing to bring a new shine to genuine ideas they already had.

University Police Safety Tips

Be Aware

• Don’t let your electronic devices distract you, always be aware of your surroundings.
• Never leave your items unattended or insecure.
• Know the location of campus emergency telephones on routes to and from campus destinations.

Vehicle Safety

• Don’t leave your car unlocked.
• Never leave your car running, especially while it is unattended or unlocked.
• Never leave your windows open.
• Don’t leave valuable personal property in plain sight.

Dorm Safety

• Read the dorm rules.
• Lock your door.
• Check the guest policy.
• Immediately report suspicious activity or individuals to the University Police at 915-747-5611.

Bicycle Safety

• Secure your bicycle to any of the bicycle racks found on campus.
• Invest in a U-Lock lock, as this lock is harder to defeat.

Library Safety Tip

If you must leave your study area, please take your cell phones, backpacks, calculators, books, and laptop computers with you. Crimes of opportunity and theft of personal property can happen within minutes.

UTEP football squad will travel on Saturday, Oct. 1, to face LA Tech for their second C-USA game of the season.

BY ADRIAN BROADDUS
The Prospector

After back-to-back disappointing losses to Army (66-14) and Southern Mississippi (34-7) at home, the Miners will travel on the road for the first time of the Top Conference USA West Division opponents, Louisiana Tech, on Saturday, Oct. 1.

The Miners (1-3, 0-1 C-USA) are not in the ideal situation they would like going into Saturday’s league play matchup. They are in distress on offense, with a question mark surrounding the quarterback position.

Although he is the heart of the offense, standout tailback Aaron Jones has been getting hanged up left and right by other teams’ defenses. And, even though the defense delivers physically and makes stops, there is no offensive production to put points on the board.

In the past three games, the Miners have been outscored 141-28, and 21 of those points were scored by Jones. Head coach Sean Kugler believes that there needs to be a change with his offense, which currently reflects a one-dimensional outlook revolving around Jones. “We were in upset on offense, minus one series,” Kugler said after the 34-7 loss to the Golden Eagles. “The defense wasn’t the issue. We’ve got a lot of things to fix. If that meant tightening it down so we can execute and get people at the right spots.”

The inconsistency Kugler is referring to stems at the quarterback position—one that even after the fourth game is still up for questions. Through the past three games, starting quarterback Zack Greenlee and backups Kavilla Johnson and Ryan Metz have completed only 48-of-72 passes combined. Also, the passes they actually completed are usually short bubble passes that lack up the little bit to no yards on offense.

“We will re-evaluate every position on offense. We were not moving the ball effectively. Whether it’s Greenlee or Metz, we’ll make that determination.”

- Sean Kugler
UTEP football head coach

When Greenlee finished the game versus Southern Miss, throwing two crucial picks and only totaling 62 yards through three quarters, Kugler believed it was time to reconsider the gunslinger position.

“We’ve reevaluated every position on offense,” Kugler said. “We were not moving the ball effectively. Whether it’s Zack Greenlee or Ryan Metz, we’ll make that determination. Both can move the ball, but one has to move the ball.”

On paper, Louisiana Tech (1-3, 0-1 C-USA) shows a lot of similarities with UTEP. They both are coming off two or more losses in a row, and both lost their conference opener. The difference is head coach Skip Holtz and the Bulldogs have lost their last three games in very close fashions.

The Bulldogs merely upset SEC affiliate Arkansas in their season opener, 21-20. After demolishing South Carolina State, 55-24, the Bulldog’s were neck and neck with Big 12 high-flying team Texas Tech. However, the air said that the Red Raiders posed too much for the Bulldogs as they fell 49-45. Against arguably the best team in the league, LA Tech lost in the final minutes to Middle Tennessee, 38-34.

While they know how to put numbers on the board, LA Tech struggles on defense. They allowed 356 total yards of offense to Middle Tennessee, with 210 of them on the ground. Even Holtz said after the loss to the Blue Raiders, “we have to get some things straight on defense with out a doubt.”

However, their defense does make up for their sub-par play on defense. Fronted by quarterback Ryan Higgins, the Bulldogs are an air-raid heavy offense. Higgins threw a whopping 504 yards against Middle Tennessee with three touchdowns. However, their defense is still up for questions.

The Miners need to get up on the board and make the Bulldogs recommit to an air-raid offense. Their defense has already had 1,224 yards of offense this past year, ranking 140th on the national scale. His favorite target, wide receiver Trent Taylor, currently ranks third in the nation in reception yards, totaling 32 yards. Kickoff between the two teams in Ruston, Louisiana, is slated for 3 p.m. CST.

It’s Metz time yet again

BY MIKE FLORES
The Prospector

In football, the most important position is the quarterback; he is the leader and the one everyone looks to call the next play. There is no other position that demands the expectations or pressure on a nightly basis than the man under center.

Quarterbacks are the first position people point to when their favorite team wins or loses; the blame or the glory all comes back to them. Zack Greenlee or Brian Metz were the third consecutive loss of the season to Southern Mississippi on Saturday, Sept. 24, and it looks like change is needed.

Zack Greenlee, the starting quarterback, gave little to no hope while matching up with the high-flying Golden Eagles.

During the second half, second-string quarterback Ryan Metz replaced Greenlee and threw 7-14 for 33 yards. After the loss, head coachs of the Miners, Sean Kugler, emphasized the need of finding a starting quarterback position.

“Both (Greenlee and Metz) can move the ball, but it’s got to be the one that does move the ball,” Kugler said. “Zack didn’t move the team effectively tonight and he’ll evaluate that.”

While the Miners got their first taste of defeat in conference play, it is safe to say the quarterback position is up for grabs.

Below are the top three reasons why Metz should win the starting job.

1. Zack Greenlee is not a passing threat for the Miners. With 449 left in the second quarter, Greenlee found himself with negative four passing yards, but the coaches still continued to keep him in the game. After Aaron Jones carried the load for the Miners’ offense, the Golden Eagles hung him up on dirty hit. Then, all the pressure landed on Greenlee’s shoulders, but he ended the half with a poor showing of 21 passing yards, one interception, no touch- downs and a 2-4-7 deficit.

When the second half came around, Greenlee received great field position after his defense recovered a fumble on the 30-yard line, down 24-7, with plenty of time left to spice a comeback. Instead of putting points on the board for his Miners, Greenlee threw a costly pick-six at the red zone, which resulted in a 100-yard interception return for a touchdown. Greenlee easily could have made the score 24-14, at least 24-10, but that turncoat cost the Miners the game. Greenlee ended the game with 62 yards passing, no scores and two poor interceptions.

Not to mention the mounning bowl from the crowd unrest of applause when Metz stepped on the field.

2. Ryan Metz has the leadership qualities of a veteran quarterback.

After the loss, Metz came into the post-game interview with much composure—almost too much for a team that had just lost by 27 points. “You have to be that guy that sparks people up. You’re trying to make sure we don’t have our heads down, and that we don’t throw the towe- el,” Metz said. “I gathered the guys before the game was over and I told them, ‘We have a whole season in front of us. That’s a whole lot of football to be played!”

Great leaders do not dwell on the past, rather they rise up and get better from everything thrown their way. Metz had a motivating attitude toward the lopsided 34-7 loss for UTEP. He was tossed into a game that no quarterback could succeed in after being down 31-7 when his number was called. He truly made the most out of his opportunity and almost had more passing yards than Greenlee through a quarter and a half.

Against their rival New Mexico State last year, Metz led a come-from-behind victory while off the bench. He threw for three touchdowns that day, ran for one and his team rallied behind him for the game-winning toss to complete a magical moment in Las Cruces. Metz was a redhead freshman, he was on the road without star tailback Aaron Jones but he still managed to score 59 points after. After the game, his teammates and coaches could not say enough about the young quarterback.

Metz’s teammates have shown and expressed their belief in the young quarterback. He just needs a shot at the starting job. When wide receivers have that much respect for their quarterback, the possibilities are endless.

3. Metz is a hometown kid.
El Paso is where Ryan Metz grew up in. It’s his second quarter game, Greenlee found himself with negative four passing yards, but the coaches still continued to keep him in the game. After Aaron Jones carried the load for the Miners’ offense, the Golden Eagles hung him up on a dirty hit. Then, all the pressure landed on Greenlee’s shoulders, but he ended the half with a poor showing of 21 passing yards, one interception, no touchdowns and a 2-4-7 deficit.

When the second half came around, Greenlee received great field position after his defense recovered a fumble on the 30-yard line, down 24-7, with plenty of time left to spice a comeback. Instead of putting points on the board for his Miners, Greenlee threw a costly pick-six at the red zone, which resulted in a 100-yard interception return for a touchdown. Greenlee easily could have made the score 24-14, at least 24-10, but that turncoat cost the Miners the game. Greenlee ended the game with 62 yards passing, no scores and two poor interceptions.

Not to mention the mounning bowl from the crowd unrest of applause when Metz stepped on the field.

Football is a team sport. Metz’s teammates have shown and expressed their belief in the young quarterback. He just needs a shot at the starting job. When wide receivers have that much respect for their quarterback, the possibilities are endless.

SOCORR DROPS FIRST C-USA GAME vs. UB
After a late goal in the 108th minute, UBU defeated the Miners 1-0 in a double-overtime battle on Sunday, Sept. 25. Despite the loss, goalkeeper Alyssa Palacios recorded seven saves in the match. The Miners (7-2-2, 0-1-0 C-USA) will continue their road game stretch against Charlotte (Sept. 30) and Old Dominion (Oct. 2).

WOMEN’S TENNIS FINISHES AGGIE INVITATIONAL
Sophomore Miners’ tennis player Reven Bennett took the Gold Singles Flight championship in Las Cruces and Daphne Viescher and Bennett placed third in the Crisson Flight Doubles bracket. Bennett was the only UTEP player to win in her respective tournament with a 7-6, 6-1 win over Marie Develar from Grand Canyon. Next, the Miners will travel to the Arizona Wildcat Invitational in Tuscon, Arizona from Sept. 30 to Oct. 2.

VOLLEYBALL TOPS BLAZERS ON THE ROAD
Despite an early deficit, the Miners’ volleyball team squirmed a come-from-behind victory over the UAB Blazers for their first Conference USA victory of the season. UTEP stole wins in the second, third, and fifth sets to take the win (20-25, 25-16, 26-24, 17-25, 15-5). Next, the Miners will bring league-play home for their C-USA opener against UTSA on Sunday, Oct. 2.

GOLF TAKES 8TH AT TUCKER INVITATIONAL
Fronted by Andreas Sorenson and Frederik Dreier, the UTEP golf team finished eighth at the William H. Tucker Invitational in Albuquerque on Saturday, Sept. 24. Sorenson and Dreier both tied for 22nd by shooting six-over-par for 222. UTEP has a break before they travel to Notre Dame in South Bend, Ind., for the Fighting Irish Classic, which will span from Oct. 9-11.

Changes are necessary for Miners to progress

BY AARON GRIFFITH
Following yet another blowout loss last Saturday in their Sun Bowl–this time to Southern Miss–UTEP football head Coach Dana Kugler was adamant that something needed to change.

“Offensively we’ve got a lot of things that we’ve got to get to fix quickly, whether that means we need to trim it down so we can execute and get the right people in the right spots,” Kugler said. “That’ll be my job to get that rectified.”

One of the key issues that Kugler said he would be looking into in the week, prior to Saturday’s road meeting with the Louisiana Tech Bulldogs (1-3), would be who will be under center for the Miners. Starting quarterback Zack Greenlee looked utterly overmatched against the Golden Eagles on Saturday and was visibly relieved by Ryan Metz after throwing his second interception—this one a pick that made the score 21-7.

After the treacherous football game, it was Metz who came to the postgame press conference and faced plenty of questions about the possibility of fighting for the starting job this week in practice.

“It tough to be in that position, where anywhere (Greenlee’s) not having that good of a game and maybe people are cheering for one. But, you know, it’s nice to hear the crowd cheering our name, something everybody would love,” Metz said. “It hurts me for Zack (Greenlee). He’s a great friend and I think he’s a great player.”

This begs the question, was it one bad game for Greenlee? Against New Mexico State, Greenlee looked like the quarterback that UTEP had been waiting for as he went 15-for-27 for 229 yards and three touchdowns. But, in the game he got injured and missed the next game at Texas. Instead of Metz, who was Kidda Ihrimbwobwe the passing game was an absolute joke.

Greenlee came back against Arizona, although he did struggle to get the ball to the through beat-down handed out by the Black Cougars. Greenlee still managed to go 9-for-17 for 143 yards and a touchdown. Perhaps Metz was right. It really does look like Greenlee had one bad game. That’s not to say that the offense itself is not to tenable, because it’s not. When Kugler said that there are a lot of things to fix, I honestly do not think he means at quarterback—by the entire offense. But, will be the one to do it.

Bruce Peace was brought in as offensive coordinator this season following the tenure of Patrick Higgins, which saw the Miners go to bowl game under the leadership of Sean Kugler; so you cannot say that Higgins will be bad. Higgins was known for controlling the game, being patient, and not forcing minimal passing and mainly just scoring enough points to win. That’s kind of what a little like Kugler and Metz did not really have an identity. He is a little more fluid—Higgins or Ka- lan. Peace has really had a full coordinator job since he left UTEP and had never had one before. The fan base got very excited when Peace came in. Word quickly got around that he knew what he was doing at Boise State with Chris Peterson, and visions of elite, high-flying offense began to dance in everyone’s heads. The truth is, Peace did well at Boise State and his team did get 12-1, but as far as schemes go, there really was no Peace to speak of, which is another reason why the truth, anybody could have been the OC there.

But Peace ramped the expectations and went to Florida the next year with a nice shiny new contract under head coach Will Muschamp. The first year, working somewhat under someone else’s scheme—a little more up-tempo, a little more high-powered like Boise State—Florida offensive flourished and the team went 13-2 and finished 10th in the SEC in total offense.

In 2013, Peace’s second year at Florida, Machamp wanted to run the offense a Little more his way and the team began to fizzle the ball up the middle and tried to control the clock. The offense stagnated and Florida had an abysmal season, going 4-8, and Peace was cut the scapula and was forced to finish at the end of the season. Much like with Higgins, we are left to question exactly why a Bruce Peace offensive look like?

So far this season, it has looked a lot like Patrick Higgins never left, or perhaps Kuersig sat Peace down when he came in and said, “Okay, this is what we do here at UTEP and nothing else.” Maybe Peace has worked with the quarterbacks enough—a former quarterback himself—to naturally increase their passing yard, but the play calling looks much the same.

When you’re struggling, you need to go back to basics, back to the base minimum and give the kids a chance to execute,” Kugler said. “Maybe there’s a little too much on their plate right now.”

As an observer of UTEP football and someone with some football knowledge, that is just plain facts. If this vanilla offense is too difficult for our team, then maybe we need to be cut looking for some Harvard-level kids to bring in here.

Aaron Jones’ talent is no secret, and I’ve sat in press conferences with Greenlee, Metz, Jaquan White and Cole Freytag. Those guys understood the run the ball up the middle every other play and then throw the ball down the shelf of by now. There is no need for simplification here. Perhaps what is needed is a revaluation of just what is we’re trying to accomplish on offense.

Running down the clock is fine. But breaking this season. The staff is literally killing Aaron Jones. Every- body in the entire stadium, including the other defense, knows that they are going to run the ball between the tackles. If Jones runs outside the tackles, they are going to thrive to him on a swing pass. They will only pass on third and long. The other team will never have to worry about a trick play or anything close to a play that looks creative, despite the fact that we had more speed than most of the teams we have played.

If you keep pounding the ball up the middle in the Miami Jones and every team knows that is your only weap- on, pretty soon you will have no Aaron Jones. It is as simple as that.

On top of that fact, if he makes it through this year in one piece, he is go- ing to leave for the NFL after this season because he cannot trust you to use him in a way that will A), show off his ability, which NFC scouts in a logical way and B) keep him safe for another season. As far as “going back to basic” and the “bas minimum”, I can only say god help the UTEP football team next week at Louisiana Tech. They are going to have three plays. First and second down will be Aaron Jones running through the A-gap, third down will be Greenlee or Metz throwing the ball more than five yards down field, and fourth down will be Alan Leza punting the ball rugby styled even though we’re all seen that if you just punt it normal- ly can kick it well over 60 yards. Expect the offense to score only seven points this again Saturday.

Prophy Pick ‘em
Each week for the UTEP football season, The Prospector staff will chime in on their picks for the up- coming football game. Think you can predict the win and score? Email your picks to the prospec- tor.depts@gmail.com for your chance for your pick to be featured in the paper.

Mike Flores — contributor
— LA Tech 52 – UTEP 6
— LA Tech offense will be too much for this. If Aaron Jones is limited, their offense is in trouble.

Michael Roman — editor-in-chief
— LA Tech 40 – UTEP 10
— Jones will get his touchdown, but won’t be enough for the Miners’ poor offensive game.

Javier Cortes — online editor
— LA Tech 59 – UTEP 20
— Metz does slightly better in another UTEP blowout loss. Aar- on Jones still gets his numbers.

Adrian Broaddus — production
— LA Tech 62 – UTEP 7
— Bulldogs will run up the score on the Miners as Ryan Higgins shows for 40+ plus yards against the Miners.
